In this scenario, each local scheduler can directly communicate with other schedulers for job dispatching. Each scheduler has a list of remote schedulers that they can interact with, or there may exist a central directory that maintains all the

2.1 Direct communication

Distributed scheduling overcomes scalability problems, which are incurred in the centralized paradigm; in addition it can offer better fault tolerance and reliability. However, the lack of a global scheduler, which has all the necessary information on available resource, usually leads to sub-optimal scheduling decisions. In this paradigm, there is no central scheduler responsible for managing all the jobs. Instead, distributed scheduling involves multiple localized schedulers, which interact with each other in order to dispatch jobs to the participating nodes. There are two mechanisms for a scheduler to communicate with other schedulers – direct or indirect communication.

2. Distributed scheduling

One advantage of a centralized scheduling system is that the scheduler may produce better scheduling decisions because it has all necessary, and up-to-date, information about the available resources. However, centralized scheduling obviously does not scale well with the increasing size of the environment that it manages. The scheduler itself may well become a bottleneck, and if there is a problem with the hardware or software of the scheduler's server, i.e. a failure, it presents a single point of failure in the environment.

Experiment No:- 07

Title: Assignment on scheduling systems.

Aim: To study various scheduling paradigms.

Learning outcome: At the end of the experiment,

1. Understand concepts and use of Scheduling System in Grid.
2. Understand the working of Scheduling system in Grid.

Theory:

Grid scheduling is defined as the process of mapping Grid jobs to resources over multiple administrative domains. A Grid job can be split into many small tasks. The scheduler has the responsibility of selecting resources and scheduling jobs in such a way that the user and application requirements are met, in terms of overall execution time (throughput) and cost of the resources utilized.

SCHEDULING PARADIGMS

Three scheduling paradigms –

1. Centralized,
2. Hierarchical and
3. Distributed.

1. Centralized scheduling

In a centralized scheduling environment, a central machine (node) acts as a resource manager to schedule jobs to all the surrounding nodes that are part of the environment. This scheduling paradigm is often used in situations like a computing center where resources have similar characteristics and usage policies. Figure 1 shows the architecture of centralized scheduling.

In this scenario, jobs are first submitted to the central scheduler, which then dispatches the jobs to the appropriate nodes. Those jobs that cannot be started on a node are normally stored in a central job queue for a later start.

Delegation and Single Sign-On

The GSI provides a delegation capability: an extension of the standard SSL protocol which reduces the number of times the user must enter his pass phrase. If a Grid computation requires that several Grid resources be used (each requiring mutual authentication), or if there is a need to have agents (local or remote) requesting services on behalf of a user, the need to re-enter the user's pass phrase can be avoided by creating a proxy.

We have also prototyped the use of cryptographic smartcards in conjunction with the GSI. This allows users to store their private key on a smartcard rather than in a filesystem, making it still more difficult for others to gain access to the key.

computer from stealing the private key, the file that contains the key is encrypted via a password (also known as a pass phrase). To use the GSI, the user must enter the pass phrase required to decrypt the file containing their private key.

A proxy consists of a new certificate (with a new public key in it) and a new private key. The new certificate contains the owner's identity, modified slightly to indicate that it is a proxy. The new certificate is signed by the owner, rather than a CA. (See diagram below.) The certificate also includes a time notation after which the proxy should no longer be accepted by others. Proxies have limited lifetimes.

The proxy's private key must be kept secure, but because the proxy isn't valid for very long, it doesn't have to be kept quite as secure as the owner's private key. It is thus possible to store the proxy's private key in a local storage system without being encrypted, as long as the permissions on the file prevent anyone else from looking at them easily. Once a proxy is created and stored, the user can use the proxy certificate and private key for mutual authentication without entering a password.

The core GSI software provided by the Globus Toolkit expects the user's private key to be stored in a file in the local computer's storage. To prevent other users of the

Securing Private Keys

A related security feature is communication integrity. Integrity means that an eavesdropper may be able to read communication between two parties but is not able to modify the communication in any way. The GSI provides communication integrity by default. (It can be turned off if desired). Communication integrity introduces some overhead in communication, but not as large an overhead as encryption.

The GSI can easily be used to establish a shared key for encryption if confidential communication is desired. Recently relaxed United States export laws now allow us to include encrypted communication as a standard optional feature of the GSI.

By default, the GSI does not establish confidential (encrypted) communication between parties. Once mutual authentication is performed, the GSI gets out of the way so that communication can occur without the overhead of constant encryption and decryption.

Confidential Communication

At this point, A and B have established a connection to each other and are certain that they know each other's identities. Now that B trusts A's identity, the same operation must happen in reverse. B sends a her certificate, A validates the certificate and sends a challenge message to be encrypted. B encrypts the message and sends it back to A, and A decrypts it and compares it with the original. If it matches, then A knows that B is who she says she is. Once B has checked out A's certificate, B must make sure that A really is the person identified in the certificate. B generates a random message and sends it to A, asking A to encrypt it. A encrypts the message using his private key, and sends it back to B. B decrypts the message using A's public key. If this results in the original random message, then B knows that A is who he says he is.

certificate.) B who A is claiming to be (the identity), what A's public key is, and what CA is being used to certify the certificate. B will first make sure that the certificate is valid by checking the CA's digital signature to make sure that the CA actually signed the certificate and that the certificate hasn't been tampered with. (This is where B must trust the CA that signed the certificate.)

Before mutual authentication can occur, the parties involved must first trust the CA's that signed each other's certificates. In practice, this means that they must have copies of the CA's certificates--which contain the CA's public keys--and that they must trust that these certificates really belong to the CA's.

To mutually authenticate, the first person (A) establishes a connection to the second person (B). To start the authentication process, A gives B his certificate. The certificate tells

If two parties have certificates, and if both parties trust the CA's that signed each other's certificates, then the two parties can prove to each other that they are who they say they are. This is known as mutual authentication. The SSL uses the Secure Sockets Layer (SSL) for its mutual authentication protocol, which is described below. (SSL is also known by a new, IETF standard name: Transport Layer Security, or TLS.)

Mutual Authentication

SSL certificates are encoded in the X.509 certificate format, a standard data format for certificates established by the Internet Engineering Task Force (IETF). These certificates can be shared with other public key-based software, including commercial web browsers from Microsoft and Netscape.

Note that a third party (a CA) is used to certify the link between the public key and the subject in the certificate. In order to trust the certificate and its contents, the CA's certificate must be trusted. The link between the CA and its certificate must be established via some non-cryptographic means, or else the system is not trustworthy.

GSI certificates are encoded in the X.509 certificate format, a standard data format for certificates established by the Internet Engineering Task Force (IETF). These certificates can be shared with other public key-based software, including commercial web browsers from Microsoft and Netscape.
